

In the Supreme Court of the United States

---

CHARLES DEMORE, DISTRICT DIRECTOR,
SAN FRANCISCO DISTRICT OF IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE, ET AL., PETITIONERS

v.

HYUNG JOON KIM

---

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI
TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS
FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT

---

BRIEF FOR THE PETITIONERS

---

THEODORE B. OLSON
Solicitor General
Counsel of Record

ROBERT D. MCCALLUM, JR.
Assistant Attorney General

EDWIN S. KNEEDLER
Deputy Solicitor General

AUSTIN C. SCHLICK
Assistant to the Solicitor
General

DONALD E. KEENER

MARK C. WALTERS

HUGH G. MULLANE

MICHELLE GORDEN

Attorneys

Department of Justice

Washington, D.C. 20530-0001

(202) 514-2217

---

---

QUESTION PRESENTED

Section 1226(c)(1) of Title 8 of the United States Code requires the Attorney General to take into custody aliens who are inadmissible to or deportable from the United States because they have committed a specified offense, including an aggravated felony. Section 1226(c)(2) of Title 8 prohibits release of those aliens during administrative proceedings to remove them from the United States, except in very limited circumstances not present here. The question presented in this case is:

Whether respondent's mandatory detention under Section 1226(c) violates the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, where respondent concedes that his criminal convictions after admission into the United States put him within the class of removable aliens who are subject to detention.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
Opinions below .....	1
Jurisdiction .....	1
Constitutional and statutory provisions involved .....	1
Statement .....	2
Summary of argument .....	8
Argument .....	11
I. Mandatory detention of criminal aliens under Section 1226(c) during proceedings to remove them from the United States is consistent with due process .....	11
A. Congress determined that criminal aliens’ flight risk and danger to the community were serious problems that justified mandatory detention .....	12
B. Congress’s determinations about the necessity of mandatory detention are judgments about immigration policy that merit particular judicial respect .....	23
C. Zadvydas supports a determination that Section 1226(c) is constitutional .....	38
II. Section 1226(c) does not in any event violate due process on its face .....	42
A. Aliens detained at the United States border have no due process right to avoid detention, and aliens who enter or remain illegally have a diminished due process .....	44
B. Mandatory detention during removal proceed- ings is particularly permissible as applied to aliens for whom there is not a significant likeli- hood of avoiding removal .....	46

IV

TABLE OF CONTENTS—Continued:	Page
C. Mandatory detention also is especially warranted when the alien has committed the most serious crimes that trigger Section 1226(c) .....	47
D. Section 1226(c) could not be held unconstitutional without reference to the duration of the alien’s detention .....	48
Conclusion .....	49
Appendix .....	1a

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Cases:

Carlson v. Landon , 342 U.S. 524 .....	10, 33, 39, 47
Fiallo v. Bell , 430 U.S. 787 (1977) .....	23, 44
Harisiades v. Shaughnessy , 342 U.S. 580 (1952) .....	33
Hoang v. Comfort , 282 F.3d 1247 (10th Cir. 2002), petition for cert. pending, No. 01-1616 (filed May 3, 2002) .....	31, 32, 38, 39, 43
INS v. Aguirre-Aguirre , 526 U.S. 415 (1999) .....	29
INS v. St. Cyr , 533 U.S. 289 (2001) .....	24, 28
INS v. Stevic , 467 U.S. 407 (1984) .....	29
INS v. Yueh-Shaio Yang , 519 U.S. 26 (1996) .....	27
Jay v. Boyd , 351 U.S. 345 (1956) .....	27
Johnson v. Eisentrager , 339 U.S. 763 (1950) .....	45
Jones v. United States , 526 U.S. 227 (1999) .....	42
Joseph, In re , 22 I.&N. Dec. 799, 1999 WL 339053 (BIA 1999) .....	26, 27
Kansas v. Hendricks , 521 U.S. 346 (1997) .....	35
Leng May Ma v. Barber , 357 U.S. 185 (1958) .....	44
Mathews v. Diaz , 426 U.S. 67 (1976) .....	33
Mathews v. Eldridge , 424 U.S. 319 (1976) .....	5, 24
Narenji v. Civiletti , 617 F.2d 745 (D.C. Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 957 (1980) .....	33
Olim v. Wakinekona , 461 U.S. 238 (1983) .....	27

Cases—Continued:	Page
Parra v. Perryman , 172 F.3d 954 (7th Cir. 1999) .....	8, 32, 43, 46
Patel v. Zemski , 275 F.3d 299 (3d Cir. 2001) .....	32, 38, 39, 43
Plyler v. Doe , 457 U.S. 202 (1982) .....	32
Radoncic v. Zemski , 28 Fed. Appx. 113 (3d Cir. 2000), petition for cert. pending, No. 01-1459 (filed Apr. 4, 2002) .....	43, 46
Reno v. Flores , 507 U.S. 292 (1993) .....	10, 23, 31, 33, 41
Richardson v. Reno , 180 F.3d 1311 (11th Cir. 1999), cert. denied, 529 U.S. 1036 (2000) .....	25
Rostker v. Goldberg , 453 U.S. 57 (1981) .....	32
Schall v. Martin , 467 U.S. 253 (1984) .....	48
Schlanger v. Seamans , 401 U.S. 487 (1971) .....	4
Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei , 345 U.S. 206 (1953) .....	23
Tefel v. Reno , 180 F.3d 1286 (11th Cir. 1999), cert. denied, 530 U.S. 1228 (2000) .....	27
United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy , 338 U.S. 537 (1950) .....	44
United States v. Salerno , 481 U.S. 739 (1987) .....	4, 43, 48
Vasquez v. Reno , 233 F.3d 688 (1st Cir. 2000), cert. denied, 122 S. Ct. 43 (2001) .....	4
Weiss v. United States , 510 U.S. 163 (1994) .....	32
Welch v. Ashcroft , 293 F.3d 213 (4th Cir. 2002) .....	24, 31, 32, 38, 39, 42, 43, 47, 48
Wong Wing v. United States , 163 U.S. 228 (1896) .....	11, 23, 46
Zadvydas v. Davis , 533 U.S. 678 (2001) .....	passim
Constitution, statutes and regulations:
U.S. Const. Amend. V .....	4, 1a
Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, Pub. L. No. 100-690, Tit. VII, § 7343(a), 102 Stat. 4470 .....	12

VI

Statutes and regulations—Continued:	Page
Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104-132, 110 Stat. 1214 .....	21
§ 440(c), 110 Stat. 1277 .....	21
§ 440(e), 110 Stat. 1277-1278 .....	22
Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009-546 .....	2
§ 303(b), 110 Stat. 3009-586 (8 U.S.C. 1226(c) note) ....	37, 47
§ 303(b)(2), 110 Stat. 3009-586 (8 U.S.C. 1226(c) note) .....	37
§ 304(a), 110 Stat. 3009-587 to 3009-593 .....	2
Immigration Act of 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-649, 104 Stat. 4978 .....	13
§ 501(a), 104 Stat. 5048 .....	14
§ 504(a)(5), 104 Stat. 5049 .....	14
§ 504(b), 104 Stat. 5050 (8 U.S.C. 1226(e)(1) (Supp. II 1990)) .....	14
Immigration and Nationality Act, 8 U.S.C. 1101 et seq. .....	2
§ 101, 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(13)(B) .....	44
§ 101(a)(43), 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(43) (1988) .....	13
§ 101(a)(43), 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(43) .....	2, 13, 22, 33
§ 101(a)(43)(A), 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(43)(A) .....	47
§ 101(a)(43)(E)(ii), 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(43)(E)(ii) .....	34
§ 101(a)(43)(F), 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(43)(F) .....	34
§ 101(a)(43)(G), 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(43)(G) .....	3
§ 101(a)(43)(R), 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(43)(R) .....	34
§§ 201-203, 8 U.S.C. 1151-1153 .....	6
§ 208(b), 8 U.S.C. 1158(b) .....	30
§ 208(b)(2), 8 U.S.C. 1158(b)(2) .....	27
§ 212, 8 U.S.C. 1182 (1994) .....	24, 27
§ 212(c), 8 U.S.C. 1182(c) (1994) .....	28
§ 212(d)(5)(A), 8 U.S.C. 1182(d)(5)(A) .....	44

VII

Statutes and regulations—Continued:	Page
§ 236(a), 8 U.S.C. 1226(a) .....	1a
§ 236(c), 8 U.S.C. 1226(c) .....	passim
§ 236(c)(1), 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(1) .....	2, 28, 1a
§ 236(c)(1)(A), 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(1)(A) .....	22, 1a
§ 236(c)(1)(B), 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(1)(B) .....	2, 22, 47, 1a
§ 236(c)(1)(B)-(C), 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(1)(B)-(C) .....	2
§ 236(c)(1)(C), 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(1)(C) .....	2, 22, 2a
§ 236(c)(1)(D), 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(1)(D) .....	2, 22, 47, 2a
§ 236(c)(2), 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(2) .....	2, 2a
§ 237(a)(1)(B), 8 U.S.C. 1227(a)(1)(B) .....	45
§ 237(a)(2), 8 U.S.C. 1227(a)(2) .....	47
§ 237(a)(2)(A), 8 U.S.C. 1227(a)(2)(A)-(D) .....	2
§ 237(a)(2)(A)(ii), 8 U.S.C. 1227(a)(2)(A)(ii) .....	3
§ 237(a)(2)(A)(iii), 8 U.S.C. 1227(a)(2)(A)(iii) .....	3-4
§ 237(a)(2)(B), 8 U.S.C. 1227(a)(2)(B) .....	2
§ 237(a)(2)(C), 8 U.S.C. 1227(a)(2)(C) .....	2
§ 237(a)(4)(B), 8 U.S.C. 1227(a)(4)(B) .....	2
§ 238(a), 8 U.S.C. 1228(a) .....	40
§ 239, 8 U.S.C. 1229 .....	3
§ 240, 8 U.S.C. 1229a .....	3
§ 240A, 8 U.S.C. 1229b .....	27, 30
§ 240A(a)(3), 8 U.S.C. 1229b(a)(3) .....	47
§ 241(a), 8 U.S.C. 1231(a) .....	3, 38, 40
§ 241(a), 8 U.S.C. 1231(a)(6) .....	7, 38, 39, 40, 42
§ 241(b)(3), 8 U.S.C. 1231(b)(3) .....	24
§ 241(b)(3)(A), 8 U.S.C. 1231(b)(3)(A) .....	29
§ 241(b)(3)(B), 8 U.S.C. 1231(b)(3)(B) .....	30
§ 242(a), 8 U.S.C. 1252(a) (1982) .....	12
§ 242(a), 8 U.S.C. 1252(a) .....	13
§ 242(a)(1), 8 U.S.C. 1252(a)(1) (1994) .....	15
§ 242(a)(2), 8 U.S.C. 1252(a)(2) (1988) .....	13
§ 242(a)(2)(B), 8 U.S.C. 1252(a)(2)(B) (Supp. II 1990) .....	14
§ 242(a)(2)(B), 8 U.S.C. 1252(a)(2)(B) (1994) .....	14
§ 242(a)(3)(A), 8 U.S.C. 1252(a)(3)(A) (1988) .....	13

VIII

Statutes and regulations—Continued:	Page
Immigration and Nationality Technical Corrections Act of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103-416, § 222, 108 Stat. 4320 .....	22
Immigration Technical Corrections Act of 1991, Pub. L. No. 102-232, § 306(a)(4), 105 Stat. 1751 (8 U.S.C. 1252(a)(2)(B) (1994)) .....	14
18 U.S.C. 16 .....	14, 34
28 U.S.C. 2241 .....	4
Cal. Penal Code (West 1999):
§ 484 .....	3
§ 666 .....	3
8 C.F.R.:
Section 3.1(a)(7) .....	40
Section 3.19(a) .....	26
Section 3.19(b) .....	26
Section 3.19(h)(2)(ii) .....	26
Section 208.16(b) .....	29
Section 208.16(f) .....	29
Section 208.22 .....	29
Section 236.1(c)(10) .....	26
Section 236.1(d)(1) .....	26
Section 236.1(d)(3) .....	26
Section 242.2(c) (1996) .....	14
Section 242.2(d) (1996) .....	15
Section 242.2(h) (1996) .....	14
Miscellaneous:
133 Cong. Rec. (1987):
p. 8771 .....	13
p. 28,840 .....	12, 13
p. 28,841 .....	13
140 Cong. Rec. 4985 (1994) .....	16
141 Cong. Rec. (1995):
p. 4394 .....	35
pp. 4395-4396 .....	35

IX

Miscellaneous—Continued:	Page
p. 15,018 .....	17
p. 15,038 .....	17
142 Cong. Rec. (1996):
p. 5281 .....	21
pp. 5293-5294 .....	21
p. 7348 .....	16
p. 7349 .....	16
Criminal and Illegal Aliens, Subcomm. on Immigration and Claims of the House Comm. on the Judiciary , 1996 WL 502071 (Sept. 5, 1996) .....	21, 36
Criminal Aliens in the United States: Hearings Before the Permanent Subcomm. on Investigations of the Senate Comm. on Governmental Affairs , 103d Cong., 1st Sess. (1993) .....	17, 18, 19, 21, 36, 38
67 Fed. Reg. (Aug. 13, 2002):
p. 52,627 .....	28
pp. 52,628-52,629 .....	28
p. 52,629 .....	28
Hearing on H.R. 723 Before the Subcomm. on International Law, Immigration, and Refugees of the House Comm. on the Judiciary , 103d Cong., 2d Sess. (1994) .....	17, 34
Hearing on H.R. 3333 Before the Subcomm. on Immigration, Refugees, and International Law, of the House Comm. on the Judiciary , 101st Cong., 1st Sess. (1989) .....	16, 17, 20, 34, 35, 37
H.R. 3529, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. (1987) .....	12-13
H.R. Rep. No. 22, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (1995) .....	17, 18, 34
H.R. Rep. No. 469, 104th Cong., 2d Sess., Pt. 1 (1996) .....	16, 19, 34, 35
H.R. Rep. No. 645, 103d Cong., 2d Sess. (1994) .....	18

Miscellaneous—Continued:	Page
INS:
Enforcement, Fiscal Year 2000 < http://www.ins.gov/graphics/aboutins/statistics/00yrbk_REF/RA2000.pdf7 > .....	30
Refugees, Asyees, Fiscal Year 2000 < http://www.ins.usdoj.gov/graphics/aboutins/statistics/00yrbk_REF/RA2000.pdf7 > .....	30
Restatement (Second) of Torts (1965) .....	45
S. 972, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. (1987) .....	13
S. Rep. No. 48, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (1995) .....	15, 17, 19, 21, 22, 25, 42, 46
S. Rep. No. 249, 104th Cong., 2d Sess. (1996) .....	16
Testimony of Doris Meissner, Commissioner, INS, Before the Senate Judiciary Comm. Concerning S. 269, the Immigrant Control and Financial Respon- sibility Act of 1995 and the Immigration Enforce- ments Improvements Act of 1995, 1995 WL 110438 (Mar. 14, 1995) .....	16, 34

In the Supreme Court of the United States

---

No. 01-1491

CHARLES DEMORE, DISTRICT DIRECTOR,
SAN FRANCISCO DISTRICT OF IMMIGRATION AND
NATURALIZATION SERVICE, ET AL., PETITIONERS

v.

HYUNG JOON KIM

---

*ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI
TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT*

---

BRIEF FOR THE PETITIONERS

---

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the court of appeals (Pet. App. 1a-30a) is reported at 276 F.3d 523. The memorandum order of the district court (Pet. App. 31a-51a) is unreported.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the court of appeals was entered on January 9, 2002. The petition for a writ of certiorari was filed on April 9, 2002, and was granted on June 28, 2002. The jurisdiction of this Court rests on 28 U.S.C. 1254(1).

CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

Relevant constitutional and statutory provisions are set out in an appendix to this brief. App, infra, 1a-3a.

STATEMENT

1. The Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 (IIRIRA), Pub. L. No. 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009-546, amended the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA), 8 U.S.C. 1101 et seq., to streamline procedures for removing certain criminal aliens from the United States. The provision of IIRIRA that is at issue in this case is Section 236(c) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. 1226(c). Section 1226(c)(1) requires the Attorney General to take into custody aliens who are inadmissible to or deportable from the United States because they have committed specified crimes. In the case of a deportable alien, Section 1226(c)(1) applies if the alien has been convicted of any of certain crimes including an aggravated felony (as defined in INA § 101(a)(43), 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(43)), two or more crimes involving moral turpitude or a crime of moral turpitude that resulted in a sentence of at least one year's imprisonment, a controlled-substance offense (other than simple possession of 30 grams or less of marijuana), a firearms offense, a specified immigration offense, espionage, sabotage, treason, or threatening the President, see 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(1)(B) and (C), 1227(a)(2)(A)-(D), or if the alien has engaged in terrorist activities, see 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(1)(D), 1227(a)(4)(B). Section 1226(c)(2) prohibits the release of aliens detained under Section 1226(c)(1) during the pendency of administrative proceedings instituted to remove them from the United States, except in very limited circumstances involving witness protection. 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(2).

Detention under Section 1226(c) lasts only for the duration of the criminal alien's administrative removal proceedings.<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> In Section 304(a) of IIRIRA, 110 Stat. 3009-587 to 3009-593, Congress instituted a new form of proceeding—known as “removal”—that applies to aliens who have entered the United States but are deportable,

Detention of an alien following the entry of a final order of removal is governed by Section 241(a) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. 1231(a), which this Court interpreted in Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678 (2001). In Zadvydas, this Court avoided constitutional concerns by interpreting 8 U.S.C. 1231(a) to limit the duration of detention of two permanent resident aliens following final orders directing their removal from the United States. See 533 U.S. at 688-701.

2. Respondent is a native and citizen of the Republic of Korea (South Korea). Respondent entered the United States legally in 1984 and became a lawful permanent resident of the United States in 1986, when he was eight years old. Pet. App. 2a, 31a-32a. In July 1996, when he was 18 years old, respondent was convicted in California state court of first degree burglary for unlawfully entering an inhabited dwelling house and inhabited portion of a building, for which he was sentenced to a suspended sentence of five years' imprisonment. See Sentence, No. SC961052 (Cal. Super. Ct. Aug. 1, 1996); Information, No. SC961052 (Cal. Super. Ct. dated May 7, 1996). In April 1997, respondent was convicted of "petty theft with priors," in violation of California Penal Code Sections 666 and 484 (West 1999), for which he received a sentence of three years' imprisonment. See Pet. App. 32a.

In December 1998, while respondent was serving his three-year state sentence, the INS charged respondent with being deportable because of his 1997 conviction for an aggravated felony.<sup>2</sup> Pet. App. 32a; see 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(43)(G), as well as to aliens who are inadmissible at the border. See 8 U.S.C. 1229, 1229a.

---

<sup>2</sup> On August 16, 2002, the INS served respondent with an additional charge of being removable because his 1996 burglary conviction and 1997 theft conviction together constitute "convict[ions] of two or more crimes involving moral turpitude, not arising out of a single scheme of criminal misconduct." 8 U.S.C. 1227(a)(2)(A)(ii).

1227(a)(2)(A)(iii). Respondent was released from state prison on February 1, 1999. On February 2, 1999, the INS took respondent into custody under Section 1226(c) and commenced removal proceedings. Pet. App. 2a, 32a. In light of the mandatory nature of Section 1226(c), the INS's San Francisco District declined to release respondent on bond. See id. at 33a; C.A. E.R. 3.

3. On May 17, 1999, respondent commenced this habeas corpus action under 28 U.S.C. 2241 in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California. Pet. App. 2a, 31a, 33a. Respondent asserted in his habeas corpus petition that Section 1226(c) is unconstitutional on its face because detention of a removable criminal alien without an individualized bond hearing violates substantive and procedural due process guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment. Respondent did not dispute that he had committed an aggravated felony, and he conceded that he is subject to mandatory detention under the terms of Section 1226(c). J.A. 8-10; see Br. in Opp. 1-2.<sup>3</sup>

On August 11, 1999, the district court declared Section 1226(c) unconstitutional on its face and ordered an individualized bond hearing to determine whether respondent presents a flight risk or a danger to the community. Pet. App. 31a-51a. Using the analytic framework of United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 747 (1987), the district court

---

<sup>3</sup> Respondent brought his habeas corpus action against the District Director of the San Francisco District of the INS and the Attorney General of the United States. See Pet. App. 31a, 33a. The District Director was the custodian of respondent and was present in the Northern District of California, and therefore was the proper respondent to the habeas corpus petition. The Attorney General was not respondent's immediate custodian and was not present in the Northern District of California, and therefore was not a proper respondent to the habeas corpus petition. See Schlanger v. Seamans, 401 U.S. 487 (1971); Vasquez v. Reno, 233 F.3d 688 (1st Cir. 2000), cert. denied, 122 S. Ct. 43 (2001).

reasoned that “lawful resident aliens possess substantive due process rights during deportation proceedings” (Pet. App. 39a), and that “[l]ess excessive means exist for accomplishing Congress’ goals [in enacting Section 1226(c)], such as having individualized bail hearings” (id. at 45a). Although the district court thus focused specifically on the substantive due process rights of permanent resident aliens, the court’s holding was that Section 1226(c) “is unconstitutional on its face.” Id. at 48a. In the alternative, the district court held that Section 1226(c) denies criminal aliens procedural due process under the analysis of Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 335 (1976). Pet. App. 48a-50a.

After the district court’s decision, the District Director of the INS released respondent on $5000 bond. Pet. App. 2a; see J.A. 11. Respondent then requested a continuance of his administrative removal proceedings. The immigration court granted respondent’s request and rescheduled his removal hearing for March 2002. See Pet. App. 2a. After respondent obtained new counsel, the hearing was continued again at respondent’s request, and over the INS’s objection, until December 24, 2003.<sup>4</sup>

4. The court of appeals affirmed on the ground that Section 1226(c) violates substantive due process when applied to respondent, as a permanent resident alien. Pet. App. 30a. The court of appeals, however, specifically did not affirm the district court’s facial invalidation of Section 1226(c). The court noted in particular that it was not addressing whether Section 1226(c) is constitutional as applied to excludable

---

<sup>4</sup> As a matter of policy, the Justice Department’s Executive Office for Immigration Review expedites removal proceedings for aliens who are detained under Section 1226(c). Respondent is not subject to that expedition policy because he was released upon order of the district court and thereafter has not been treated as a detained alien.

aliens who have been detained at the United States border. Id. at 5a-6a.

The court of appeals first emphasized respondent's status as a lawful permanent resident alien, observing that this "most favored" (Pet. App. 7a) immigration status entitles an alien to live permanently in the United States, to work in this country, and to apply for citizenship, and that permanent resident status most often is granted because of the alien's family ties to the United States. See generally 8 U.S.C. 1151-1153. The court concluded that, because of their statutory rights and potentially strong family and business ties to the United States, lawful permanent resident aliens have a liberty interest in freedom from detention during removal proceedings, which the Constitution protects. Pet. App. 7a-8a.

The court of appeals next reasoned that although detention of lawful permanent residents under Section 1226(c) "is civil and regulatory" in nature, "not criminal or punitive" (Pet. App. 12a; see Zadvydas, 533 U.S. at 690), that detention is permissible only if the government "provide[s] a 'special justification' outweighing the individual's liberty interest" (Pet. App. 11a (quoting Zadvydas, 533 U.S. at 690)). The court identified "two principal justifications" for mandatory detention: "(1) preventing criminal aliens from fleeing during removal proceedings; and (2) protecting the public from potentially dangerous aliens." Id. at 12a. But the court found those justifications insufficient.

The court of appeals acknowledged the government's interest in ensuring criminal aliens' availability for removal from the country. Pet. App. 12a. The court held, however, that ensuring availability for removal does not justify mandatory detention during removal proceedings because some criminal aliens may be able to obtain a determination that they are not removable, or to obtain relief from removal under the provisions of the INA. See id. at 13a-15a. The court also rejected the government's reliance on a 1996 Justice Department study (J.A. 14-64) that showed that 89% of "nondetained" aliens subject to a final deportation order failed to appear for deportation. The court believed that the Justice Department study in fact suggested that aliens who have been released on bail are likely to be removed successfully. See Pet. App. 15a-16a; but see note 7, infra.

The court of appeals also recognized the government's interest in protecting the public against additional wrongdoing by criminal aliens while removal proceedings are pending. See Pet. App. 16a-17a. The court concluded, however, that the "aggravated felony" classification that triggered respondent's mandatory detention under Section 1226(c) reaches crimes that the court did not deem "egregious" or inherently suggestive of a public "menace[]." Id. at 20a. The court thus determined that commission of one of the crimes that requires detention under Section 1226(c) is not sufficiently probative of dangerousness to justify mandatory detention of a permanent resident alien. Id. at 20a-21a.

The court of appeals cited congressional testimony by a former Commissioner of the INS for the proposition that "the government itself appears to have some doubt about" the necessity and desirability of the mandatory detention required by Section 1226(c). Pet. App. 21a. The court also concluded that the necessity of mandatory detention of criminal aliens during administrative removal proceedings is called into question by 8 U.S.C. 1231(a)(6), which gives the Attorney General discretion to release criminal aliens who are under a final order of removal, if they have not been removed during the 90-day removal period. Pet. App. 22a-23a. The court of appeals therefore determined "that the government has not provided a 'special justification' for no-bail civil detention sufficient to overcome a lawful permanent resident alien's liberty interest." Id. at 23a. In doing so, the court of appeals disagreed (id. at 26a-27a) with the Seventh

Circuit's decision in Parra v. Perryman, 172 F.3d 954 (1999), which upheld Section 1226(c) against a due process challenge by a lawful permanent resident alien.<sup>5</sup>

Finally, the court of appeals determined that there is no plausible narrowing construction of Section 1226(c) that would cause it to satisfy substantive due process. See Pet. App. 27a-29a. Accordingly, the court held that a lawful permanent resident alien in removal proceedings must be afforded “a bail hearing with reasonable promptness to determine whether the alien is a flight risk or a danger to the community.” Id. at 30a.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

I. A. The mandatory detention requirement of 8 U.S.C. 1226(c) is the product of Congress's close scrutiny of the actual consequences of allowing release of criminal aliens. The legislative record showed that approximately 80% of deportable criminal aliens had multiple arrests while in the United States, and that nearly half of those aliens were re-arrested within a year of being released from prison. More than 20% of criminal aliens who were released by the Attorney General or never taken into custody during their deportation proceedings failed to appear for the proceedings. When non-detained aliens were ordered to appear for deportation from the United States, nearly 90% absconded. Numerous witnesses confirmed that mandatory detention should be part of Congress's solution to those problems.

Congress determined that existing statutory provisions that gave the Attorney General discretion to release criminal aliens were not ensuring removal of the most undesirable aliens from the United States. Congress concluded that mandatory detention of a selected group of criminal aliens, during the pendency of their removal proceedings, is necessary to implement its immigration policies.

---

<sup>5</sup> The court of appeals also expressed the view (Pet. App. 23a-26a) that its decision was consistent with the analysis of Justice Kennedy's dissenting opinion in Zadvydas, 533 U.S. at 705-725.

B. The policy judgments that Congress made when it enacted Section 1226(c) are within its plenary power over the admission and expulsion of aliens and deserve judicial deference. The court of appeals' reasons for holding Section 1226(c) unconstitutional are without merit.

The court of appeals deemed it important that a criminal alien's removal proceedings will not always result in a final order of removal. That has no bearing upon Congress's effort to ensure that the criminal aliens specified in Section 1226(c) appear at the removal proceedings themselves. Furthermore, an alien who disputes that he is removable may raise that argument as a challenge to his detention, and will be released if he shows that the INS is substantially unlikely to prevail on its charge of removability.

The theoretical possibility that a criminal alien might obtain discretionary relief from removal or withholding of removal also does not undermine the constitutionality of Section 1226(c). As part of its effort to address the serious problem of criminal aliens, Congress imposed rules that make the removal of those aliens more certain and more speedy. Those restrictions and Section 1226(c) are mutually reinforcing, because each makes it very likely that a criminal alien subject to detention under Section 1226(c) will soon be removed.

Congress similarly acted within the scope of its plenary immigration powers when it determined that criminal aliens who flee from removal proceedings present a special danger to the Nation. Congress routinely makes categorical judgments about the admission, treatment, and removal of different groups of aliens. Even when detention is at issue, this Court has upheld the use of a categorical approach in the immigration context, subject to only deferential judicial review. See Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292 (1993); Carlson v. Landon, 342 U.S. 524 (1952). Here, Congress's judgment rests upon the high recidivism rate for criminal aliens, as well as the nature of the crimes specified in Section 1226(c). The crimes that trigger Section 1226(c) are ones that Congress found to present special concerns because of their implications for national security or public safety.

C. Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678 (2001), supports the constitutionality of Section 1226(c). The critical fact in Zadvydas, which gave rise to constitutional concern, was that the deportable aliens in that case, who were under final orders of removal, might be subject to indefinite (and possibly permanent) detention if they could not be removed. Section 1226(c), by contrast, is limited in duration because it applies only while the alien is in proceedings to determine whether there will be a final order of removal. Throughout the period of detention, Section 1226(c) always serves the purpose of ensuring the alien's availability for removal proceedings, as well as for removal if it is ordered. And Section 1226(c) does not raise the possibility of open-ended detention as in Zadvydas. Indeed, removal proceedings are expedited for aliens who are in detention and generally are resolved by immigration judges within approximately one month.

II. Respondent's facial due process challenge to Section 1226(c) is especially untenable, because respondent clearly cannot show that Section 1226(c) violates due process in every application. For example, an alien who was stopped at the border has no due process claim to be released from detention under Section 1226(c), which prevents him from entering the United States without authorization while his removal proceeding is pending. Likewise, an alien who entered or remained in the United States illegally, and committed further crimes during his unlawful presence, has an especially weak claim to due process protection in this context. A criminal alien who has no significant likelihood of avoiding removal likewise could not present a viable due process challenge to detention pending his impending removal. And some removable aliens will have committed crimes, such as terrorist activities or the most egregious felonies, that justify mandatory detention without regard to other governmental interests. Finally, Section 1226(c) could not be held unconstitutional without reference to the duration of the alien's detention. The necessity of considering factors such as these demonstrates that a facial due process attack on Section 1226(c) cannot succeed.

ARGUMENT

I. MANDATORY DETENTION OF CRIMINAL ALIENS UNDER SECTION 1226(C) DURING PROCEEDINGS TO REMOVE THEM FROM THE UNITED STATES IS CONSISTENT WITH DUE PROCESS

Aliens detained under 8 U.S.C. 1226(c) have committed crimes that terminate their entitlement to remain in the United States. In their criminal proceedings, those aliens benefitted from the same due process protections as United States citizens. See Wong Wing v. United States, 163 U.S. 228, 237 (1896). Congress has determined that after their criminal convictions, those aliens should be removed from the United States with as much certainty, and as little risk to the public, as possible. The mandatory detention provisions of Section 1226(c) effectuate those objectives. Because Congress enacted Section 1226(c) in the exercise of its plenary power to direct the removal of unwelcome aliens from the United States, because the legislative record compiled by Congress concretely demonstrated the widespread problem of flight and recidivism among criminal aliens, and because detention under Section 1226(c) applies only to aliens who have committed specified crimes and lasts only during the limited duration of the alien’s removal proceedings, Section 1226(c) satisfies due process.

A. Congress Determined That Criminal Aliens’ Flight Risk And Danger To The Community Were Serious Problems That Justified Mandatory Detention

Congress required the Attorney General to detain specified criminal aliens during their removal proceedings because it determined that earlier detention procedures, which allowed discretionary release, had failed to ensure the removal of criminal aliens from the United States. That legislative determination was made after an extensive investigation by Congress, in an area in which congressional findings are entitled to particular judicial respect.

1. Until the late 1980s, Section 242 of the INA afforded the Attorney General wide latitude to release criminal aliens from custody during their deportation proceedings. The law provided that “[p]ending a determination of deportability” in administrative proceedings, an alien “may, upon warrant of the Attorney General, be arrested and taken into custody.” 8 U.S.C. 1252(a) (1982) (emphasis added). When the Attorney General detained an alien, he had discretion (subject to judicial review in habeas corpus proceedings) whether to keep the alien in custody, release the alien on bond, or release the alien on conditional parole. 8 U.S.C. 1252(a) (1982).

In 1988, Congress limited the Attorney General’s discretion over custody determinations as part of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, Pub. L. No. 100-690, Tit. VII, § 7343(a), 102 Stat. 4470. Representative Smith, one of the sponsors of the 1988 legislation, expressed the concern that “[a]ll too often, [criminal] aliens—whether here legally or illegally—who are arrested for various felonious crimes, evade deportation, dodge trials, and continue with their recidivist activities.” 133 Cong. Rec. 28,840 (1987) (discussing H.R.

3529, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. (1987)). He noted that, whereas more than 100,000 illegal aliens were arrested for criminal offenses in 1986, the INS was able to deport only 12,000. Ibid.; id. at 8771 (statement of Sen. Chiles, introducing S. 972, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. (1987)). Representative Smith also explained that criminal aliens operated major narcotics syndicates throughout the United States and “have been connected with money laundering, racketeering, weapons sales, prostitution rings, and a host of other heinous crimes.” Id. at 28,840. “[O]ften,” he observed, criminal aliens “are able to pay expensive bonds and disappear under a new identity” until arrested again “with a different name and a new offense.” Ibid.; see id. at 8771. Senator Chiles observed that the presence of criminal aliens “is so widespread and lucrative that they are attracting other aliens into the United States to join in the illegal enterprises.” Id. at 8771.

As part of an effort to address the “growing problem of felonious aliens,” 133 Cong. Rec. at 28,841 (Rep. Smith), Congress amended Section 242(a) of the INA by providing that “[t]he Attorney General shall take into custody any alien convicted of an aggravated felony upon completion of the alien’s sentence for such conviction,” and prohibiting the Attorney General from releasing those deportable aliens. 8 U.S.C. 1252(a)(2) (1988). Congress defined the term “aggravated felony” to include murder, drug trafficking, and trafficking in firearms or destructive devices. 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(43) (1988). Congress additionally required the Attorney General to pursue new initiatives for the identification and apprehension of criminal aliens. 8 U.S.C. 1252(a)(3)(A) (1988).

Congress refined the INA’s detention provisions in the Immigration Act of 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-649, 104 Stat. 4978. On one hand, Congress broadened the definition of “aggravated felony” set out in 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(43) by adding additional narcotics trafficking offenses, crimes of violence

(as defined in 18 U.S.C. 16) for which a prison term of at least five years was imposed, and like offenses in violation of foreign law—thus expanding the category of criminal aliens potentially subject to mandatory detention. See Pub. L. No. 101-649, § 501(a), 104 Stat. 5048. Congress also required detention of inadmissible aggravated felons during their exclusion proceedings. See Pub. L. No. 101-649, § 504(b), 104 Stat. 5050 (codified at 8 U.S.C. 1226(e)(1) (Supp. II 1990)). On the other hand, Congress added to Section 242 a new provision, 8 U.S.C. 1252(a)(2)(B) (Supp. II 1990), that required the Attorney General to release a permanent resident alien from custody during his deportation proceeding “if the Attorney General determines that the alien is not a threat to the community and that the alien is likely to appear before any scheduled hearings.” See Pub. L. No. 101-649, § 504(a)(5), 104 Stat. 5049.

In 1991, Congress again amended the provision governing detention and release by clarifying that the alien had the burden of proving non-dangerousness and the absence of a flight risk, and by extending the possibility of release to all lawfully admitted aliens who could make the necessary showing, rather than just permanent resident aliens. See Immigration Technical Corrections Act of 1991, Pub. L. No. 102-232, § 306(a)(4), 105 Stat. 1751 (codified at 8 U.S.C. 1252(a)(2)(B) (1994)).

Due to the various amendments, as of 1991 lawfully admitted aliens convicted of aggravated felonies could obtain discretionary release from custody during their deportation proceedings, provided that they could demonstrate that they were not a threat to the community and were likely to appear for any scheduled deportation hearings. See 8 U.S.C. 1252(a)(2)(B) (1994); see also 8 C.F.R. 242.2(c) and (h) (1996). As had long been the case, moreover, the Attorney General continued to have discretion whether to detain, during the pendency of deportation proceedings, criminal aliens whose crimes did not include an aggravated felony. See 8 U.S.C. 1252(a)(1) (1994); see also 8 C.F.R. 242.2(d) (1996).

2. While Congress was addressing the specific question of detention of criminal aliens during the late 1980s and early 1990s, it also began to consider wholesale reform of the Nation's immigration laws, including revisions that would enable the INS to remove aliens convicted of serious crimes more expeditiously from the United States. Congress concluded after extensive investigation that "America's immigration system is in disarray and criminal aliens (non-U.S. citizens residing in the U.S. who commit serious crimes for which they may be deportable) constitute a particularly vexing part of the problem." S. Rep. No. 48, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. 1 (1995). That conclusion led to the enactment in 1996 of IIRIRA, including its provision for mandatory detention of aliens convicted of serious crimes, during the pendency of their removal proceedings.

Congress's investigation showed that at least 450,000 aliens were incarcerated or under some form of criminal justice supervision, and that the INS could not identify most deportable criminal aliens, much less locate them and remove them from the country. S. Rep. No. 48, supra, at 1, 2. Indeed, the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee calculated that, at the then-current rate of deportation, it would take more than 23 years to remove every criminal alien who was already subject to deportation. Id. at 5.

Congress's inquiry into the problem identified three particular concerns about the INS's failure to remove more criminal aliens. First, criminal aliens' ongoing presence in the United States undermined the Nation's immigration policies and control of the Nation's borders. As the House Report on IIRIRA explained, Congress concluded that "our immigration laws should enable the prompt admission of those who are entitled to be admitted, the prompt exclusion or removal of those who are not so entitled, and the clear distinction between these categories.” H.R. Rep. No. 469, 104th Cong., 2d Sess., Pt. 1, at 111 (1996). Congress determined that “[a]liens who enter or remain in the United States in violation of our law are effectively taking immigration opportunities that might otherwise be extended to others, potential legal immigrants whose presence would be more consistent with the judgment of the elected government of this country about what is in the national interest.” S. Rep. No. 249, 104th Cong., 2d Sess. 7 (1996); see 142 Cong. Rec. 7348, 7349 (1996) (statement of Sen. Abraham) (removing criminal aliens opens “slots in this country for immigrants who want to make a contribution.”).

Furthermore, as an official of the General Accounting Office testified, failures in removing deportable aliens “ha[d] to be addressed to have an effective immigration policy.” Hearing on H.R. 3333 Before the Subcomm. on Immigration, Refugees, and International Law of the House Comm. on the Judiciary (1989 House Hearing), 101st Cong., 1st Sess. 71-72 (1989). Reinforcing that view, the Commissioner of the INS testified that “[o]ne of the most important deterrents to illegal immigration is a credible and timely threat of removal for violation of the immigration laws.” Testimony of Doris Meissner, Commissioner, INS, Before the Senate Judiciary Comm. Concerning S. 269, the Immigrant Control and Financial Responsibility Act of 1995 and the Immigration Enforcement Improvements Act of 1995, 1995 WL 110438 (Mar. 14, 1995).

Second, Congress determined that criminal aliens who are not timely removed “are a serious threat to our public safety.” 140 Cong. Rec. 4985 (1994) (statement of Sen. Roth). A report prepared by the House Judiciary Committee explained that as a result of past congressional and Executive Branch policies, “many aliens who committed serious crimes were released into American society after they were released from incarceration, where they then continue to pose a threat to those around them.” H.R. Rep. No. 22, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. 6-7 (1995). There was hard evidence of criminal aliens’ recidivism. A 1986 study by the General Accounting Office found that, out of a sample of 200 felony arrestees in New York whom the INS identified as being potentially deportable, 77% were arrested at least one more time before the INS initiated deportation proceedings, and 45% were arrested multiple times before their deportation proceedings began. 1989 House Hearing, supra, at 54, 62; see 141 Cong. Rec. 15,018, 15,038 (1995) (statement of Sen. Abraham). In Los Angeles, 40% of the deportable aliens who were released from the County Jail in May 1990 were rearrested within the next 12 months, and 80% had a history of previous or subsequent arrests (totaling seven arrests, on average). Hearing on H.R. 723, et al., Before the Subcomm. on International Law, Immigration, and Refugees of the House Comm. on the Judiciary (1994 House Hearing), 103d Cong., 2d Sess. 171, 173 (1994) (statement of Rep. Beilenson).

Third, Congress found that the INS’s failure to remove recidivist criminal aliens was imposing a “significant cost * * * on our society.” H.R. Rep. No. 22, supra, at 6-7. The Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs estimated that confinement of criminal aliens in state and federal prisons cost taxpayers at least $724 million per year. S. Rep. No. 48, supra, at 1, 9; Criminal Aliens in the United States: Hearings Before the Permanent Subcomm. on Investigations of the Senate Comm. on Governmental Affairs (1993 Senate Hearing), 103d Cong., 1st Sess. 13-14 (1993). There were 53,000 criminal aliens in federal and state prisons in 1995, as compared to fewer than 9000 in 1980. Criminal aliens were the “fastest growing segment of federal prison population” and comprised approximately 25% of all federal inmates. S. Rep. No. 48, supra, at 1, 6-7. Criminal aliens likewise made up 16% of California’s state prison population, and they “place[d] a substantial burden on certain local and State governments” because of the costs of prosecuting and incarcerating criminal aliens and their contribution to prison overcrowding. H.R. Rep. No. 645, 103d Cong., 2d Sess. 4, 18, 21 (1994); see 1993 Senate Hearing, supra, at 13 (“Law enforcement costs money and a considerable amount of money is being spent policing, adjudicating, confining and deporting criminal aliens.”).

3. Motivated by the collective force of those concerns, Congress resolved “to help ensure that aliens convicted of serious crimes are promptly removed from our society after serving their [criminal] sentence.” H.R. Rep. No. 22, supra, at 6. Accomplishing that objective in turn required consideration of the frequency with which criminal aliens, once located, were absconding before their deportation. While the mandatory detention provisions instituted by the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 had “prevent[ed] the very worst of the criminal aliens from further endangering the public and from being able to flee before deportation,” the 1990 and 1991 amendments—which restored the possibility of bond for certain aggravated felons—had “weakened substantially” the government’s efforts to deport criminal aliens and to protect public safety. 1993 Senate Hearing, supra, at 15, 26 (staff report and testimony); see H.R. Rep. No. 22, supra, at 12. The Senate Governmental Affairs Committee found that as a result of the 1990 and 1991 amendments, and because of a shortage of space in INS detention facilities, “many [criminal aliens] who should be detained [during deportation proceedings] are released on bond.” H.R. Rep. No. 22, supra, at 2; see 1993 Senate Hearing, supra, at 21 (staff report) (“Although detaining a criminal alien pending his removal proceeding guarantees that the alien will actually appear at that proceeding, this option is often not available due to INS’s chronic lack of detention space.”). The House Judiciary Committee agreed that the INS’s failure to detain aliens during their deportation proceedings was “[a] chief reason why many deportable aliens are not removed from the United States.” H.R. Rep. No. 469, supra, Pt. 1, at 123.

Congress had before it specific evidence about the consequences of allowing discretionary release of criminal aliens during their deportation proceedings. According to information collected in 1992, more than 20% of criminal aliens who were released on bond or otherwise not kept in custody throughout their deportation proceedings failed to appear for those proceedings. S. Rep. No. 48, supra, at 2, 23; 1993 Senate Hearing, supra, at 21. The rate of flight doubled to 42% for criminal aliens whom the INS had not taken into custody at any time before a final order of deportation was entered. 1993 Senate Hearing, supra, at 21. In 1992 alone, approximately 11,000 aliens who had committed an aggravated felony failed to appear for their deportation hearing. Id. at 3.

A “related” problem was that aliens who were not already in INS custody were overwhelmingly likely to abscond from actual deportation. 1993 Senate Hearing, supra, at 9. In New York in fiscal year 1993, 88% of non-detained aliens failed to report for deportation after receiving a notice of their scheduled departure.<sup>6</sup> Ibid.; S. Rep. No. 48, supra, at 23-24; accord J.A. 38-39 (372 notices in nationwide sample resulted in 40 alien surrenders). Consistent with the New York data, the Justice Department’s Inspector General calculated in March 1996, based upon a sample of 1058 cases in 1993 and 1994, that only 11% of non-detained aliens with final orders of deportation were successfully removed from the United States, whereas the INS was able to remove almost 94% of the detained aliens who were ordered deported. (The remaining 6% were allowed to stay in this country for political or humanitarian reasons, or remained for other reasons unrelated to their availability for removal.) J.A. 14, 21, 26, 32.<sup>7</sup>

---

<sup>6</sup> Because of the extraordinarily high flight rate, INS officials often referred to the INS’s departure notices as “run notices.” S. Rep. No. 48, supra, at 24; see J.A. 38.

Witnesses before Congress who were intimately familiar with the problem of absconding criminal aliens confirmed the importance of detaining those aliens pending deportation. Based upon its investigation, the General Accounting Office advised that “[w]e know that alternatives to detaining prisoners don’t often work.” 1989 House Hearing, supra, at 75; accord J.A. 46 (Justice Department Inspector General’s conclusion that “[d]etention is key to effective deportation”); see J.A. 17, 47 (same). Similarly, the Chief of the Trial Division of the Manhattan District Attorney’s Office told the House Judiciary Committee that his “[n]umber one” recommendation for addressing the problem of criminal aliens was to incarcerate alien aggravated felons for their crimes, and then

---

<sup>7</sup> In this case, the Ninth Circuit deemed it “obvious” that aliens released on bond were counted as “detained” aliens in the Inspector General’s report, and thus did not contribute to the 89% “skip rate.” Pet. App. 15a-16a & n.1. The conclusion that the Inspector General would describe aliens who were released from custody as “detained” is, to say the least, not “obvious.” In fact, contrary to the court of appeals’ belief, the text of the Inspector General’s report confirms that aliens who were released on bond rather than held in detention were counted in the category of “nondetained” aliens, who had an overall 11% removal rate. See J.A. 36 (“[INS] staff cited detained aliens and aliens released on bond as their priority cases. Other nondetained cases were worked as time allowed.”) (emphasis added). The court relied, as support for its linguistically unlikely reading, on the report’s statement that two detained aliens who were released on bond absconded. Pet. App. 16a n.1. But we have been informed by the Office of the Inspector General that—consistent with the language in its report—it in fact counted aliens who were released on bond while awaiting removal within the “nondetained” category. The two aliens referred to in the portion of the report cited by the court of appeals were held in INS detention for a period after the entry of a final order of deportation and were only later released on bond.

“detain and deport” them. Id. at 120, 130. The Executive Director of the Justice Department office responsible for adjudicating deportation proceedings suggested that no amount of bond could ensure aliens’ appearance at those proceedings. Id. at 35 (testimony of David Milhollan). And the INS informed Congress that it had used appropriated funds to take additional aliens into custody during their deportation proceedings in fiscal year 1996, which “contributed greatly to [a] 25 percent increase in removals” of aliens during that year. Criminal and Illegal Aliens, Subcomm. on Immigration and Claims of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 1996 WL 502071 (Sept. 5, 1996) (statement of David A. Martin, General Counsel, INS).

Such evidence led Congress ineluctably to conclude that discretionary release of deportable criminal aliens was undermining enforcement of the immigration laws, and that mandatory detention during removal proceedings would be an effective measure to ensure the aliens’ availability for removal. See, e.g., S. Rep. No. 48, supra, at 32 (“Congress should consider requiring that all aggravated felons be detained pending deportation. Such a step may be necessary because of the high rate of no-shows for those criminal aliens released on bond.”); 1993 Senate Hearing, supra, at 24 (same); 142 Cong. Rec. 5281, 5293-5294 (1996) (recommendation of Congressional Task Force on Immigration Reform to require detention of all criminal aliens).

4. In April 1996, Congress addressed the problem of criminal aliens when it enacted the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDPA), Pub. L. No. 104-132, 110 Stat. 1214. Section 440(c) of AEDPA, 110 Stat. 1277, overrode the 1990 and 1991 amendments that had allowed the Attorney General to release lawfully admitted aliens who had been convicted of aggravated felonies, and instead required the detention of all aliens convicted of aggravated felonies or certain other crimes. In September 1996, Congress readopted those reforms by enacting Section 1226(c) as part of IIRIRA, thus again requiring the Attorney General to detain aliens who are removable because of serious criminal convictions, pending an administrative determination of their removability.

Congress did not require detention of all criminal aliens, however. In light of the practical restriction on the INS's ability to house detained criminal aliens (see S. Rep. No. 48, supra, at 21), Congress limited the mandatory detention remedy to criminal aliens who had committed crimes that Congress deemed especially serious because of their impact upon national security, public safety and welfare, and enforcement of the immigration laws. Section 1226(c) therefore requires mandatory detention pending removal following an alien's participation in terrorist activities or espionage (see 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(1)(B) and (D)), commission of an aggravated felony (see 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(1)(B)),<sup>8</sup> or commission of a specified controlled-substance offense, a firearms offense, or (under certain circumstances) crimes of moral turpitude (see 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(1)(A), (B), and (C)).

---

<sup>8</sup> In a series of amendments, Congress expanded the INA's definition of "aggravated felony" (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(43)), principally to include offenses that it found to underlie organized immigration crime. See citations at pp. 34-35, infra. The Immigration and Nationality Technical Corrections Act of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103-416, § 222, 108 Stat. 4320, amended the definition to include offenses relating to: firearms and explosive materials; theft; the demand or receipt of ransom; child pornography; racketeer influenced corrupt organizations; operation of prostitution businesses; peonage, slavery, and involuntary servitude; fraud; and document fraud. AEDPA further revised the aggravated felony definition by adding gambling offenses, transportation for the purpose of prostitution if committed for commercial advantage, forgery and counterfeiting, commercial bribery, unlawful trafficking in vehicles, obstruction of justice, perjury, and bribery of a witness. AEDPA § 440(e), 110 Stat. 1277-1278.

B. Congress’s Determinations About The Necessity Of Mandatory Detention Are Judgments About Immigration Policy That Merit Particular Judicial Respect

This Court has long recognized that proceedings to expel aliens “would be vain if those accused could not be held in custody pending the inquiry into their true character and while arrangements were being made for their deportation.” Wong Wing, 163 U.S. at 235; see Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 699 (2001) (finding no basis for constitutional concern when detention of alien subject to final order of removal occurs within “a period reasonably necessary to secure removal”). The power to exclude or expel aliens is a “fundamental sovereign attribute exercised by the Government’s political departments largely immune from judicial control.” Fiallo v. Bell, 430 U.S. 787, 792 (1977) (quoting Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 210 (1953)). Because detention of removable aliens is an aspect of that exclusion and expulsion, it is largely “committed to the political branches of the Federal Government.” Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292, 305 (1993).

Thus, although congressional determinations underlying detention in aid of removal pursuant to the INA are not wholly beyond judicial review, “the judicial branch must defer to executive and legislative branch decisionmaking in that area.” Zadvydas, 533 U.S. at 695. In particular, judicial review of Section 1226(c) “must take appropriate account of the greater immigration-related expertise of the [political] Branch[es], of the serious administrative needs and concerns inherent in the necessarily extensive INS efforts to enforce this complex statute, and the Nation’s need to ‘speak with one voice’ in immigration matters.” Id. at 700.

Against this background, the court of appeals was wrong to override Congress’s determination that mandatory detention of criminal aliens who are subject to Section 1226(c) is necessary to accomplish important immigration objectives (see Pet. App. 12a-21a), and then to order, for permanent resident aliens (see id. at 30a), a return to the same discretionary-release system that Congress found so deficient.<sup>9</sup>

1. The court of appeals was “not persuaded” that mandatory detention is necessary to ensure removal of the criminal aliens whom Congress has made subject to Section 1226(c), or sufficiently tailored to that objective. Pet. App. 13a. The court of appeals reasoned that a criminal alien subject to Section 1226(c) might not be removed at all if he obtains: (a) a determination that he is not removable under the INA; (b) discretionary cancellation of his removal under 8 U.S.C. 1182 (1994) and INS v. St. Cyr, 533 U.S. 289 (2001); or (c) withholding of removal under 8 U.S.C. 1231(b)(3) in order to protect the alien against possible persecution in his home country. In the court of appeals’ view, the possibility that removal proceedings might be resolved in the alien’s favor on one of those grounds, together with the fact that some aliens who are released from custody will appear for their removal proceedings and for removal if it is ordered, render mandatory detention impermissibly over-broad as a response to the problem of flight by permanent resident aliens who have committed one of the predicate crimes. See Pet. App. 13a-16a. The court of appeals' analysis is severely flawed.

---

<sup>9</sup> In addition to its “substantive” due process analysis, the court of appeals undertook a short and essentially repetitive “procedural” due process analysis. See Pet. App. 48a-50a. As the Fourth Circuit has explained, a criminal alien’s procedural due process challenge to denial of a bond hearing in accordance with Section 1226(c) “collapses into” a substantive due process challenge to the requirement of mandatory detention under Section 1226(c). Welch v. Ashcroft, 293 F.3d 213, 218 n.4 (4th Cir. 2002). For the same reasons discussed below within the framework of substantive due process, respondent has no procedural due process right to a bond hearing: The government’s interests in detention during removal proceedings and the government’s inability to prevent flight by aliens through individualized bond hearings outweigh respondent’s interest in release from custody during his removal proceedings. See Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 335 (1976).

a. In the first place, the court of appeals ignored that mandatory detention under Section 1226(c) ensures not only a criminal alien's availability for removal if it is ordered, but also, in every case, the criminal alien's availability for removal proceedings. Evidence before Congress showed that criminal aliens who were not in custody had a flight rate of 20 to 42% from deportation proceedings (in addition to non-detained aliens' extraordinary flight rate of approximately 90% from actual deportation). See p. 19, supra. Congress could reasonably determine that the discretionary release system unacceptably undermined immigration enforcement when, in any group of five deportable criminal aliens, one or two predictably would abscond from their deportation proceedings. See Richardson v. Reno, 180 F.3d 1311, 1318 (11th Cir. 1999) ("The relationship of detention to removal proceedings is underscored by congressional findings that criminal aliens, with great regularity, fail to show for their immigration proceedings.") (citing S. Rep. No. 48, supra), cert. denied, 529 U.S. 1036 (2000). Indeed, that legislative determination rests upon a policy judgment about the sufficiency of particular removal procedures that is entitled to the utmost deference by the courts. Cf. Zadvydas, 533 U.S. at 695 (indicating that challenge to INS detention would not be justiciable if relief entailed "'sufferance of aliens' who should be removed" (quoting id. at 703 (Scalia, J., dissenting)) (internal quotation marks omitted)).

b. Quite aside from the court of appeals' failure to appreciate the importance of Section 1226(c) in securing a criminal alien's presence at his removal proceedings, the three hypothetical scenarios that the court of appeals relied upon do not support the conclusion that mandatory detention under Section 1226(c) violates due process.

Removability. The court of appeals noted (Pet. App. 14a-15a) that the alien might be able to persuade the immigration judge that he is not removable from the United States, for instance because his crime is not one that requires removal. In the case of criminal aliens who are subject to mandatory detention, however, the fact of removability ordinarily will be established, beyond dispute, by the alien's judgment of conviction. In this case, for example, respondent has conceded that, based upon his 1997 conviction, he is removable as an aggravated felon and therefore is subject to detention under Section 1226(c). See Br. in Opp. 1-2; J.A. 8-9.

The court of appeals also overlooked that aliens may raise key issues concerning their removability in a challenge to detention under Section 1226(c). A person in INS custody who disputes that he is subject to mandatory detention may do so in a bond determination proceeding before the INS district director and in a subsequent bond redetermination hearing before an immigration judge. See 8 C.F.R. 3.19(a), (b), and (h)(2)(ii); 8 C.F.R. 236.1(c)(10) and (d)(1); In re Joseph, 22 I. & N. Dec. 799, 805, 1999 WL 339053, at *5 (BIA 1999). An adverse decision by an immigration judge may be appealed to the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA). See 8 C.F.R. 236.1(d)(3). Thus, if a criminal alien in mandatory detention raises an issue such as whether he is a United States citizen, whether he actually was convicted of an offense, or whether his conviction is for an offense that triggers removal proceedings and mandatory detention under Section 1226(c)(1)—and if the alien can show that the INS is “substantially unlikely” to prevail on its underlying charge of removability—Section 1226(c) will not apply to the alien and the alien will be eligible for discretionary release while his claims are resolved in the removal proceeding. In re Joseph, 22 I. & N. Dec. at 806, 1999 WL 339053, at *6-7.

Discretionary Relief from Removal. In IIRIRA, Congress rendered aliens who have been convicted of aggravated felonies ineligible for the discretionary relief of asylum and cancellation of removal. See 8 U.S.C. 1158(b)(2), 1229b. The court of appeals observed (Pet. App. 14a) that under this Court's decision in St. Cyr, some aggravated felons who pleaded guilty before the 1996 amendments to the INA are eligible for discretionary relief from removal under 8 U.S.C. 1182 (1994), which Congress repealed in 1996. But that possible avenue to discretionary relief for some aliens does not render mandatory detention under Section 1226(c) unconstitutional.

An alien who is seeking discretionary relief from removal has no claim to be free from mandatory detention on that basis. A grant of wholly discretionary relief is "not a matter of right under any circumstances, but rather is in all cases a matter of grace." Jay v. Boyd, 351 U.S. 345, 354 (1956). Such relief is accorded pursuant to the Attorney General's "unfettered discretion," and is akin to "a judge's power to suspend the execution of a sentence, or the President's power to pardon a convict." INS v. Yueh-Shaio Yang, 519 U.S. 26, 30 (1996) (internal quotation marks omitted). An alien (like a citizen) has no constitutionally protected interest in obtaining such relief. Olim v. Wakinekona, 461 U.S. 238, 249 (1983); see Tefel v. Reno, 180 F.3d 1286, 1300-1301 (11th Cir. 1999) (alien lacks protected liberty or property interest in grant of suspension of deportation), cert. denied, 530 U.S. 1228 (2000). Thus, a removable alien who is detained while the Attorney General's delegates consider his application for discretionary relief is properly treated as removable unless and until a decision to award discretionary relief is made, at which time mandatory detention under Section 1226(c) would cease.

The court of appeals also overstated (Pet. App. 14a) St. Cyr's significance for a due process analysis of Section 1226(c). This Court held in St. Cyr that Congress's elimination of the possibility of a discretionary waiver of deportation under 8 U.S.C. 1182(c) (1994) does not apply retroactively to aliens who pleaded guilty before the effective date of that repeal and who would have been eligible for a discretionary waiver of deportation, despite their convictions, at the time of their criminal plea. 533 U.S. at 314-326. Even before Congress repealed 8 U.S.C. 1182(c) (1994), however, aggravated felons who had served a sentence of more than five years were ineligible for relief under that section. St. Cyr therefore allows an alien to seek discretionary relief from deportation on account of a conviction for which the alien entered a guilty plea before April 24, 1996, but only if the alien is a lawful permanent resident who did not serve an aggravated felony sentence of more than five years. See 67 Fed. Reg. 52,627, 52,628-52,629 (Aug. 13, 2002) (discussing proposed Justice Department rule implementing St. Cyr); 8 U.S.C. 1182(c) (1994).

At the present time and in the future, an alien who is taken into INS custody under Section 1226(c) upon release from his criminal sentence will have served more than five years of imprisonment following any guilty plea covered by St. Cyr (which must have been entered before April 1996, see 67 Fed. Reg. at 52,629).<sup>10</sup> Thus, St. Cyr applies to few aggravated felons who became subject to detention under Section 1226(c) after April 2001. Respondent, who pleaded guilty to his aggravated felony offense in April 1997, is among the many criminal aliens not eligible to make a St. Cyr claim for discretionary relief.<sup>11</sup>

---

<sup>10</sup> The Attorney General is required to take aliens subject to mandatory detention under Section 1226(c) into detention when they are released from penal custody. 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(1).

Withholding of Removal. Finally, the court of appeals relied (Pet. App. 13a-14a) upon the fact that not all aliens who have committed a criminal offense that triggers mandatory detention during removal proceedings are ineligible for withholding of removal. Withholding of removal protects an alien from removal to his home country if the Attorney General determines that the “alien’s life or freedom would be threatened in that country because of the alien’s race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion.” 8 U.S.C. 1231(b)(3)(A). Unlike asylum, withholding of removal is a mandatory rather than discretionary form of protection from removal. The alien, however, bears the burden of demonstrating a “clear probability of persecution.” INS v. Stevic, 467 U.S. 407, 430 (1984); see INS v. Aguirre-Aguirre, 526 U.S. 415, 419-420 (1999) (discussing relationship between asylum and withholding of removal); 8 C.F.R. 208.16(b). The possibility that an alien ultimately might carry that burden does not render unconstitutional mandatory detention in the meantime—i.e., when the alien has not proved his eligibility for withholding of removal.

Moreover, withholding of removal is country-specific and does not prevent the INS from removing the alien to another country where he would not be persecuted. See 8 U.S.C. 1231(b)(3)(A). The premise of that protection is not that the alien has an entitlement to avoid removal from the United States, but rather that he should not be removed to a particular country at that time. See 8 C.F.R. 208.16(f), 208.22.

---

<sup>11</sup> Respondent was convicted in California Superior Court on April 23, 1997, and sentenced on October 8, 1997. See C.A. E.R. 6, 7. The court of appeals’ opinion incorrectly states (Pet. App. 2a) that respondent was convicted in August 1997.

Furthermore, many criminal aliens held under Section 1226(c) are statutorily disqualified from receiving withholding of removal because they have committed a “particularly serious crime” such as an aggravated felony for which a sentence of at least five years’ imprisonment was imposed. See 8 U.S.C. 1231(b)(3)(B). Finally, withholding of removal is rarely granted. The Executive Office for Immigration Review in the Department of Justice advises that in fiscal year 2001, its immigration judges decided 47,513 cases (involving both criminal and non-criminal aliens) in which a claim for asylum or withholding of removal was filed, and withholding of removal was granted in only 3,450 of those cases, or approximately seven percent.<sup>12</sup>

c. More broadly, and contrary to the court of appeals’ reasoning (Pet. App. 13a-15a), the correlation between an alien’s likely removal and a risk of flight highlights the particular appropriateness of mandatory detention in the context of an aggravated felon. Through IIRIRA, Congress expedited the removal of aggravated felons, and made them wholly ineligible for discretionary relief from removal. See 8 U.S.C. 1158(b) (asylum), 1229b (cancellation of removal). Thus, aggravated felons are particularly likely to be ordered removed from the United States. Indeed, because aggravated felons (with the limited exception of those covered by St. Cyr) are no longer entitled to seek the discretionary relief that had been available before 1996, the flight rates from deportation proceedings that Congress identified during its consideration of the 1996 immigration reforms likely understate the current probability that an aggravated felon would abscond if not detained.

---

<sup>12</sup> In respondent’s case, South Korea is not a country for which applications for protection from removal are often granted. Compare INS, Refugees, Asylees, Fiscal Year 2000 Table 26 <http://www.ins.usdoj.gov/graphics/aboutins/statistics/00yrbk\_REF/RA2000.pdf> (asylum awards) with INS, Enforcement, Fiscal Year 2000 Table 66 <http://www.ins.usdoj.gov/graphics/aboutins/statistics/00yrbk\_ENF\_REV/ENF2000.pdf> (removals).

2. The court of appeals also determined (Pet. App. 16a-21a) that protecting the public against recidivism by criminal aliens is not a sufficient justification for mandatory detention under Section 1226(c). Looking to cases involving civil detention outside the immigration area (see id. at 17a-18a), the court of appeals concluded that the correct test is whether Section 1226(c) “is narrowly tailored to people who pose an unusual and well-defined danger to the public” (id. at 17a). The court was of the view that Section 1226(c) does not satisfy that test, because “[g]iven the range of crimes qualifying as aggravated felonies, the government simply cannot show that § 1226(c) covers only aliens who pose an especially serious danger to the public.” Id. at 20a; accord Hoang v. Comfort, 282 F.3d 1247, 1260 (10th Cir. 2002), petition for cert. pending, No. 01-1616 (filed May 3, 2002).

a. The court of appeals gave no weight in its analysis to the immigration context in which this case arises. Because of Congress’s broad powers over immigration and the distinct status of aliens while they are in this country, detention of aliens can be within Congress’s “broad power over immigration and naturalization”—and therefore permissible under the Constitution—even if detention of a citizen would be impermissible under the same circumstances. Flores, 507 U.S. at 305-306 (quoting Fiallo, 430 U.S. at 792). Thus, in Flores, the Court held that “any doubts as to the [facial] constitutionality of institutional custody over unaccompanied juveniles” who were suspected of being deportable was eliminated by the fact that most of the juveniles subject to detention were aliens. Id. at 305. The detainees’ status as non-citizens, and the detention’s relationship to immigration policy, dictated “unexacting” rational-basis review. Id. at 306; see Welch v. Ashcroft, 293 F.3d 213, 222 (4th Cir. 2002) (detention under Section 1226(c) comports with substantive due process if it is reasonably related to legitimate government interests and non-punitive).<sup>13</sup> Categorical rules about which aliens should be admitted to or removed from the United States, and about the timing and terms of such admission or removal, are a pervasive and necessary feature of immigration law. Accordingly, categorical legislative judgments are particularly permissible when Congress exercises its plenary authority over immigration. See Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 225 (1982) (“Congress has developed a complex scheme governing admission to our Nation and status within our borders. * * * The obvious

---

<sup>13</sup> The Court need not choose between the rational-basis test of Flores and stricter tests such as the “special justification” rule applied by the court of appeals in this case (see Pet. App. 12a). Nor is it necessary to resolve the disagreement among the courts of appeals as to whether detention of permanent resident aliens pending the outcome of their removal proceedings implicates a fundamental right. Compare Patel v. Zemski, 275 F.3d 299, 309- 310 (3d Cir. 2001) (finding fundamental right) and Hoang, 282 F.3d at 1257-1258 (same), petition for cert. pending, No. 01-1616 (filed May 3, 2002), with Welch, 293 F.3d at 220-222 (no fundamental right) and Parra v. Perryman, 172 F.3d 954, 958 (7th Cir. 1999) (same). Whatever standard of review is applicable in this case, it should be applied with regard for the political Branches’ plenary authority over matters of immigration policy. See Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57, 64-72 (1981) (rejecting government’s argument for rational-basis review in equal protection challenge to draft-registration law, but stating that deference nevertheless must be given to Congress’ decisions about military affairs); see also Weiss v. United States, 510 U.S. 163, 177-178 (1994) (military context affects due process analysis). In these circumstances, deference principles require essentially the same analysis as the rational-basis standard that this Court applied in Flores. In Zadvydas, by contrast, the detention that this Court found constitutionally problematic occurred after removal from the United States was “no longer practically attainable,” and the detention therefore did not “bear[] [a] reasonable relation” to implementation of any congressional immigration policy. 533 U.S. at 690.

need for delicate policy judgments has counseled the Judicial Branch to avoid intrusion into this field.”); Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 77-84 (1976).

For example, a permanent resident alien who is personally loyal to the United States nevertheless may be expelled if his nation becomes an enemy of the United States. Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 587 (1952). And nationality is a permissible basis for drawing immigration-related distinctions among aliens who are lawfully in this country, so long as the distinctions are not wholly irrational. See, e.g., Narenji v. Civiletti, 617 F.2d 745, 747 (D.C. Cir. 1979) (upholding registration requirements for Iranian students), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 957 (1980).

In the detention context, this Court has upheld the drawing of categorical conclusions about a deportable alien’s dangerousness from the alien’s participation in Communist activities. Carlson v. Landon, 342 U.S. 524, 541-542 (1952). In Carlson, the Court rejected the dissent’s argument that a “general practice of denying bail to all active Communists” was impermissible, and that “[t]hese persons should have the benefit of an exercise of discretion by the Attorney General, freed from any conception that Congress had made them in effect unbailable.” Id. at 559, 568 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting). Similarly, the detention upheld in Flores was based “upon a ‘blanket’ presumption of the unsuitability of custodians other than parents, close relatives, and guardians,” yet this Court held that such “reasonable presumptions and generic rules” were permissible even when made by the INS rather than Congress itself. 507 U.S. at 313.

b. In this case, the court of appeals afforded Congress’s categorical judgments no deference at all. Instead, the court relied upon its own view (Pet. App. 20a) that some of the crimes within the INA’s definition of “aggravated felony” (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(43))—including possession of a firearm by a felon, involuntary manslaughter constituting a “crime of violence” under 18 U.S.C. 16, and counterfeiting<sup>14</sup>—do not indicate an “especially serious danger to the public.” The court of appeals appears to have concluded (Pet. App. 4a) that only an alien’s conviction of a violent crime that facially endangers “physical safety” can support mandatory detention.

Congress made a different judgment. It deemed all crimes within the INA’s definition of “aggravated felony” to be particularly serious when committed by an alien, because such crimes are integral to international terrorism, drug trafficking, and organized immigration crime, which do threaten physical (and other) harms. See, e.g., 1994 House Hearing, supra, at 124, 125, 181 (connecting visa and passport fraud to terrorism and drug-trafficking); 1989 House Hearing, supra, at 18 (statement of Jack Shaw, Assistant Commissioner, INS) (listing immigration fraud, along with crimes of violence and drug smuggling, as “activity [that] represents the greatest threat to public safety”), 26 (racketeering is “major law enforcement problem[] involving aliens”).

Congress was especially intent upon addressing the harms associated with alien smuggling and related offenses. See H.R. Rep. No. 22, supra, at 7-8 (discussing alien smuggling rings and their involvement in other crimes); H.R. Rep. No. 469, supra, Pt. 1, at 116 (“Alien smuggling is often linked to other crimes, such as drug smuggling and trafficking, prostitution, racketeering, and severe labor law violations.”); Testimony of Doris Meissner, supra, 1995 WL 110438 (organized immigration rings engage in criminal activities and enterprises including counterfeiting, illegal acquisition of firearms and explosives, narcotics smuggling and trafficking, money laundering, and racketeering activity such as extortion, bribery, obstruction of investigation by violence, and financial fraud); 1989 House Hearing, supra, at 36 (statement of Jack Shaw) (discussing crimes of alien smuggling rings), 44 (same). As Representative McCollum of Florida explained, aliens in organized crime rings “extort large sums from * * * illegal immigrants in return for passage to the United States and for the fraudulent documents they need to obtain entry. In many cases, these illegal immigrants * * * are forced into involuntary servitude, prostitution, and other crimes in order to repay these fees. In some cases * * *, the attempt to smuggle these illegals goes tragically wrong and people die.” 141 Cong. Rec. 4394 (1995). Representative Kennedy likened alien-smuggling to the “slave trade.” Id. at 4395-4396; see H.R. Rep. No. 469, supra, Pt. 1, at 117 (“many smuggled aliens are victims, more than beneficiaries,” of alien smuggling). Congress thus reasonably determined that smuggling-related crimes are “serious crimes that threaten public safety and national security.” H.R. Rep. No. 469, supra, Pt. 1, at 107.

---

<sup>14</sup> See cases cited at Pet. App. 20a; see also 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(43)(E)(ii), (F), and (R).

c. The court of appeals also expressed the view that “the fact of a prior conviction alone * * * can be unreliable evidence of dangerousness.” Pet. App. 20a. But there is nothing unusual or constitutionally suspect about basing a prediction of future dangerousness upon a past criminal conviction. See Zadvydas, 533 U.S. at 714 (Kennedy, J., dissenting) (“Aliens ordered deported as the result of having committed a felony have proved to be dangerous.”); Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 358 (1997) (“[P]revious instances of violent behavior are an important indicator of future violent tendencies.”) (internal quotation marks omitted). Congress, moreover, identified a repeat arrest rate for criminal aliens of approximately 40% within one year of release from prison, and noted that approximately 80% of criminal aliens have multiple arrests. See p. 17, supra.

In this case, the permissibility of Congress’s categorical determination that respondent’s convictions are sufficient to terminate his permanent resident status and render him removable is unchallenged. Congress was equally entitled to determine on a categorical basis that respondent’s criminal history warrants effective steps to guarantee that he will not harm the United States—through criminal recidivism or by flouting the sovereign right of removal—before the statutory removal requirement can be implemented.

3. The court of appeals found support for its decision in “doubt” expressed by the Commissioner of the INS “about whether no-bail civil detention is a desirable—let alone a necessary—means of dealing with aliens subject to removal proceedings.” Pet. App. 21a; see id. at 21a-22a. Congress was fully aware in 1996 of the INS’s preference for a detention regime that vested the Attorney General (and hence the INS) with broad discretion. See, e.g., Testimony of David A. Martin, supra, 1996 WL 502071 (arguing after AEDPA’s amendments to Section 242 that “a better enforcement strategy would restore at least some of the flexibility previously granted to the Attorney General”); 1993 Senate Hearing, supra, at 100 (Justice Department opposition to mandatory detention). But the INS’s principal reason was that mandatory detention would quickly fill INS detention space—not that mandatory detention would be ineffective. Testimony of David A. Martin, supra, 1996 WL 502071; see 1993 Senate Hearing, supra, at 55 (mandatory detention of additional criminal aliens would “substantially impact our limited detention capability”). The INS stressed the direct connection between detention of criminal aliens, their successful removal from the United States, and effective enforcement of the immigration laws. Testimony of David A. Martin, supra, 1996 WL 502071 (“[I]ncreased detention space does much more than ensure the removal of a given alien. It also helps restore the overall credibility of the deportation process.”); see 1989 House Hearing, supra, at 22-23 (testimony of Jack Shaw, Assistant Commissioner, INS) (“[T]he limitations on our detention capacity directly impact our ability to effectively remove the alien from the country.”).

When it enacted Section 1226(c), Congress rejected the INS’s view that discretionary detention of criminal aliens should be favored over mandatory detention. But Congress accommodated the INS’s immediate pragmatic concern about detaining additional criminal aliens pending deportation. IIRIRA provided the Attorney General the option of invoking, for a period of up to two years, transitional custody rules that delayed certain expansions of the class of removable criminal aliens subject to mandatory detention, and allowed the Attorney General to release criminal aliens who were not aggravated felons if he determined that they would not present a danger to the safety of other persons or property and would be likely to appear for their removal proceedings. See IIRIRA § 303(b) (reprinted in 8 U.S.C. 1226(c) note). The Attorney General could (and did) trigger the transitional rules by certifying that there were insufficient detention space and INS personnel to implement Section 1226(c), but the mandatory detention provisions of Section 1226(c) thereafter became effective in October 1998. See IIRIRA § 303(b)(2) (reprinted in 8 U.S.C. 1226 note).

Congress thus was resolute that mandatory detention of the criminal aliens described in 8 U.S.C. 1226(c), rather than a regime allowing discretionary release, is necessary. Congress’s decision to commit itself to new spending for the detention facilities and staff needed to institute mandatory detention highlights Congress’s conviction that the discretionary detention policy in place until 1988 and during the early 1990s had failed. A 1993 report by the staff of the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee captures Congress’s view: The Committee staff acknowledged that “[t]he detention option is problematical” because “INS has limited detention space and * * * funds for detention,” but it nevertheless determined that “[r]elease on bond * * * is even more of a problem since our investigation has found that large numbers of non-detained criminal aliens abscond and fail to appear for their deportation hearing.” 1993 Senate Hearing, supra, at 8.

C. Zadvydas Supports A Determination That Section 1226(c) Is Constitutional

The four courts of appeals that have held that Section 1226(c) violates due process in some applications cite this Court’s decision in Zadvydas as support for their holdings. See Pet. App. 9a-12a, 23a, 26a; Welch, 293 F.3d at 224-227, 228 (Widener, J., concurring), 228-236 (Williams, J., concurring in the judgment); Hoang, 282 F.3d at 1255-1259; Patel v. Zemski, 275 F.3d 299, 309-310, 313 (3d Cir. 2001). In fact, however, Zadvydas supports the constitutionality of Section 1226(c).

The critical fact in Zadvydas, which the Court found to justify interpreting 8 U.S.C. 1231(a) to limit the duration of detention of two permanent resident aliens who were subject to final removal orders, was that Section 1231(a) otherwise would have authorized “indefinite, perhaps permanent, detention.” 533 U.S. at 699; see id. at 690 (“A statute permitting indefinite detention of an alien would raise a serious constitutional problem.”). The Court eliminated that constitutional doubt by construing 8 U.S.C. 1231(a)(6) to authorize detention of the alien, after entry of a final removal order, only as long as removal is reasonably foreseeable. 533 U.S. at 699.<sup>15</sup>

---

<sup>15</sup> This Court held in Zadvydas that the detention authorized by Section 1231(a) is civil, and “assume[d]” for purposes of its due process analysis that the detention is “nonpunitive in purpose and effect.” 533 U.S. at 690. As the court of appeals in this case correctly held (Pet. App.

Section 1226(c) does not raise a similar constitutional concern. In Section 1226(c) Congress itself specified an “obvious termination point” (533 U.S. at 697) for detention, because the provision applies only during the pendency of the alien’s removal proceedings. The Court in Zadvydas expressly distinguished detention under Section 1226(c) from detention under Section 1231(a)(6) on precisely that basis. Ibid. (“[P]ost-removal-period detention, unlike detention pending a determination of removability * * *, has no obvious termination point.”) (emphasis added).<sup>16</sup>

The actual implementation of Section 1226(c) reinforces this fundamental statutory difference. The Executive Office for Immigration Review has calculated that, in cases where the alien is charged with being removable on grounds that trigger mandatory detention under Section 1226(c), its immigration judges complete removal proceedings in an average time of 47 days and a median time of 30 days—both far below the six-month period that this Court determined was presumptively reasonable for detention after a final order of 12a), the detention required by Section 1226(c) likewise is civil and regulatory rather than criminal and punitive. Accord Patel, 275 F.3d at 310-311; Hoang, 282 F.3d at 1258-1259; see Welch, 293 F.3d at 222-224 (Section 1226(c) not punitive on its face); see also Carlson, 342 U.S. at 537-538 (“Deportation is not a criminal proceeding and has never been held to be punishment.”).

---

<sup>16</sup> Similarly, and contrary to the opinion of the court of appeals (Pet. App. 22a-23a), there is no logical inconsistency between the mandatory detention requirement of Section 1226(c) and 8 U.S.C. 1231(a)(6), which gives the Attorney General discretionary authority, after the expiration of the statutory 90-day removal period, to release a criminal alien who is subject to a final order of removal but who has not yet been removed. The possibility of discretionary release after the end of the post-order removal period serves to address the possibility of an indefinite and unavoidable delay in removal, which has no analog when an alien is detained under Section 1226(c) during his administrative removal proceedings.

removal.<sup>17</sup> See Zadvydas, 533 U.S. at 701. In approximately 85% of the cases, the immigration judge’s decision is not appealed to the BIA and becomes a final decision, and the alien thereafter would be detained (if ordered removed) under 8 U.S.C. 1231(a) rather than under Section 1226(c). In the relatively small percentage of cases that are appealed to the BIA, the average time required for disposition of the appeal—from the filing of the appeal through the BIA’s issuance of its decision—is approximately four months. The median time is slightly shorter (114 days).<sup>18</sup> Accordingly, detention during the pendency of removal proceedings cannot fairly be compared to the “indefinite, perhaps permanent, detention” (533 U.S. at 699) of aliens that raised a constitutional concern in Zadvydas.

Other aspects of Zadvydas further support the constitutionality of Section 1226(c). The Court’s constitutional concern about indefinite detention under Section 1231(a)(6) arose in part from the possibility of detention “where detention’s goal”—removal from the United States—“is no longer practically attainable.” 533 U.S. at 690; see id. at 699 (“[I]nterpreting the statute to avoid a serious constitutional threat, we conclude that, once removal is no longer reasonably foreseeable, continued detention is no longer authorized by statute.”). Because detention under Section 1226(c) is limited to the period when the alien is in removal proceedings, it always serves the purpose of ensuring a criminal alien’s appearance at removal proceedings, as well as the alien’s availability for removal at the end of those proceedings if (as is very likely) a final order of removal is entered. Section 1226(c) thus is analogous to post-order detention while removal is reasonably foreseeable, which this Court found free from constitutional doubt in Zadvydas.

---

<sup>17</sup> The processing times given for proceedings before an immigration judge reflect the amount of time between the docketing of the INS’s charging document and the issuance of an appealable decision by an immigration judge, for cases completed in fiscal year 2001. They do not apply to cases adjudicated by an immigration judge while the alien is still in criminal custody. In that situation, the alien is not detained by the INS pursuant to Section 1226(c). See 8 U.S.C. 1228(a).

<sup>18</sup> Moreover, the BIA has recently established a streamlined appeal process that is expected to reduce further the length of time that cases are pending before that body. See 8 C.F.R. 3.1(a)(7) (allowing affirmance by single Board member without opinion where three-judge review is not warranted).

Relatedly, Zadvydas indicates that the risk of flight from immigration proceedings constitutes a “sufficiently strong special justification” for detention when there is a “reasonable relation” between the detention and its purpose. 533 U.S. at 690 (internal quotation marks omitted); cf. Flores, 507 U.S. at 306 (testing deportation-related detention under “the (unexacting) standard of rationally advancing some legitimate governmental purpose”). The evidence compiled by Congress about criminal aliens’ 20-42% flight rate from deportation proceedings under the discretionary-release regime, and the approximately 90% flight rate of non-detained aliens from actual deportation (see p. 19, supra), firmly establishes a “reasonable relation” between mandatory detention and the removal of criminal aliens pursuant to the requirements of the INA.

Likewise, the Court indicated in Zadvydas that an alien’s dangerousness suffices to justify detention when it is “limited to specially dangerous individuals and subject to strong procedural protections.” 533 U.S. at 691; see id. at 721 (Kennedy, J., dissenting) (satisfaction of due process requirements depends upon procedures available to aliens). Congress included in the list of deportable aliens subject to mandatory detention under Section 1226(c) only a subset of aliens who committed crimes that Congress deemed especially serious. For those aliens, moreover, the predicate for the determination of dangerousness, like the predicate for their removability, is a conviction that was obtained in court with full criminal process.<sup>19</sup> See Welch, 293 F.3d at 223-224 (“[P]rior convictions as a basis for regulatory detention require fewer due process safeguards” because, “unlike virtually any other consideration used to enlarge the possible deprivation[,] . . . a prior conviction must itself have been established through procedures satisfying the fair notice, reasonable doubt, and jury trial guarantees.”) (quoting Jones v. United States, 526 U.S. 227, 249 (1999)) (brackets omitted); S. Rep. No. 48, supra, at 3 (“[C]riminal aliens have already been afforded all the substantial due process required under our system of criminal justice before being convicted beyond a reasonable doubt of a felony.”). In these respects as well, Zadvydas supports the constitutionality of mandatory detention under Section 1226(c).

II. SECTION 1226(C) DOES NOT IN ANY EVENT VIOLATE DUE PROCESS ON ITS FACE

Respondent’s habeas corpus petition presented only a facial due process challenge to 8 U.S.C. 1226(c) (Pet. App. 33a; J.A. 9-10), and the district court held that the law is “unconstitutional on its face.” Pet. App. 50a. The court of appeals did not affirm that aspect of the district court’s decision. Instead, the court of appeals stressed (id. at 5a-6a) that it was not considering the constitutionality of mandatory detention of aliens stopped at the border, who have not been admitted into the United States. Nevertheless, the court of appeals held that Section 1226(c) is unconstitutional as applied to respondent and, more broadly, that due process requires that lawful permanent residents who are subject to <sup>19</sup> As discussed (see pp. 26-27, supra), a detained alien who disputes the existence of a predicate criminal conviction in his case may seek release from detention on that basis. Cf. Zadvydas, 533 U.S. at 722-723 (Kennedy, J., dissenting) (discussing regulatory procedures that protect alien held under Section 1231(a)(6)).

---

mandatory detention under Section 1226(c) must be given “a bail hearing with reasonable promptness to determine whether the alien is a flight risk or a danger to the community.” Id. at 6a, 30a.

The court of appeals was correct to reject respondent’s assertion that Section 1226(c) can never be constitutionally applied to detain an alien without a bond hearing during his removal proceeding. See United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 745 (1987) (“A facial challenge to a legislative Act is * * * the most difficult challenge to mount successfully, since the challenger must establish that no set of circumstances exists under which the Act would be valid.”). But the court was wrong to extend its (incorrect) holding on the facts of this case categorically to a whole class of aliens. Indeed, even if it were assumed for purposes of argument that Section 1226(c) may not be applied to respondent on the particular facts of this case, the law still would be enforceable against many thousands of criminal aliens.<sup>20</sup>

---

<sup>20</sup> The Seventh Circuit in Parra, 172 F.3d 954, rejected a due process challenge to Section 1226(c) where the alien (a lawful permanent resident) conceded his removability. The Tenth Circuit, like the Ninth Circuit, has held Section 1226(c) unconstitutional as applied to lawful permanent residents, but the law’s constitutionality as applied to other groups of criminal aliens in that circuit is uncertain. See Hoang, 282 F.3d at 1261. In the Third Circuit, Section 1226(c) has been held unconstitutional as applied to both a lawful permanent resident alien (see Patel, 275 F.3d 299) and an alien who entered the United States without inspection and who remained in the United States unlawfully (see Radoncic v. Zemski, 28 Fed. Appx. 113 (2002), petition for cert. pending, No. 01-1459 (filed Apr. 4, 2002)). In Welch, the Fourth Circuit rejected a facial challenge to Section 1226(c) and instead undertook a case-specific inquiry into whether mandatory detention “based on a record of prior criminal conduct is a reasonable and not excessive way to prevent flight risk and to protect the community.” 293 F.3d at 223, 224-228. A majority of the Fourth Circuit panel concluded that the alien in that case, having been detained for more than six months, was entitled to release unless entry of a final order of removal

A. Aliens Detained At The United States Border Have No Due Process Right To Avoid Detention, And Aliens Who Enter Or Remain Illegally Have A Diminished Due Process Claim

The court of appeals itself highlighted one situation in which mandatory detention is manifestly permissible: that of an alien who has been stopped at the border and has not entered the United States. As this Court observed in Zadvydas, detention of “[a]liens who have not yet gained initial admission to this country * * * present[s] a very different question” from detention of lawful permanent resident aliens like respondent and the two aliens in Zadvydas. 533 U.S. at 682; see id. at 692-694 (distinguishing Mezei). As the Court held in Mezei and reaffirmed in Zadvydas, due process protections do not apply to aliens at the border. “Whatever the procedure authorized by Congress is, it is due process as far as an alien denied entry is concerned.” Mezei, 345 U.S. at 212 (quoting United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 544 (1950)); see Zadvydas, 533 U.S. at 692-693. Furthermore, detention of aliens who are stopped at the border effectuates the political Branches’ power to prevent those aliens’ unlawful entry and physical presence in the United States in the first place.<sup>21</sup> See Fiallo, 430 U.S. at 792; Mezei, 345 U.S. at 210, 215-216. Respondent (or actual removal) was reasonably likely in the foreseeable future. See 293 F.3d at 228 (Widener, J., concurring), 234-235 (Williams, J., concurring in the judgment).

---

<sup>21</sup> This is true even of aliens who are physically present in the United States on immigration parole, which is not an admission to the country. See 8 U.S.C. 1182(d)(5)(A) (“parole * * * shall not be regarded as an admission of the alien”); 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(13)(B) (alien who is paroled “shall not be considered to have been admitted”); Mezei, 345 U.S. at 215 (alien’s “harborage” on land, as an act of “legislative grace,” conferred no additional rights); Leng May Ma v. Barber, 357 U.S. 185, 190 (1958) (parole of aliens seeking admission to United States is not admission).

himself appears to accept that Section 1226(c) satisfies due process as applied to an alien who is stopped at the United States border. See Br. in Opp. 15.

Aliens who enter the United States illegally or do not comply with the terms of their visa also have a far weaker claim to due process protection as a general matter than permanent resident aliens.<sup>22</sup> As the Court noted in Zadvydas, the due process protection to which a removable alien is constitutionally entitled “may vary depending upon [the alien’s] status and circumstance.” 533 U.S. at 694; see Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763, 770 (1950) (“The alien, to whom the United States has been traditionally hospitable, has been accorded a generous and ascending scale of rights as he increases his identity with our society.”). Aliens who are present in the United States in violation of law are removable for that reason alone. See 8 U.S.C. 1227(a)(1)(B). Because illegal aliens’ presence in this country is unlawful, the necessarily limited associations, rights, and responsibilities that they accumulate during their unlawful presence convey only the most attenuated entitlement to constitutional protection. Furthermore, it is particularly doubtful that an alien who is in the United States illegally, and who commits additional crimes during his unlawful stay, could be considered likely to obey the requirements of the law if released into the community, or to be likely to appear voluntarily for removal proceedings. Section 1226(c) therefore is especially justified as applied to this group of aliens, as well.<sup>23</sup>

---

<sup>22</sup> Aliens who enter the United States illegally or who overstay their permission to be in this country might be compared to common-law trespassers, to whom the landowner—here, by analogy, the United States—owes no duty of care. See Restatement (Second) of Torts §§ 329, 333 (1965).

<sup>23</sup> For these reasons, the Third Circuit was clearly wrong when it held that “the legal issue” of Section 1226(c)’s constitutionality as applied to an

B. Mandatory Detention During Removal Proceedings Is Particularly Permissible As Applied To Aliens For Whom There Is Not A Significant Likelihood Of Avoiding Removal

As explained above (pp. 24-30, supra), Section 1226(c) is not rendered unconstitutional by the theoretical possibility that a criminal alien might, as a result of the removal proceedings for which he is detained, be allowed to remain in the United States. Nevertheless, Section 1226(c) is especially defensible as applied to aliens who concede their removability, or for whom there is not a significant likelihood of succeeding in a challenge to removal. See Parra, 172 F.3d 954.

There is no constitutionally significant difference between detention during an administrative proceeding that assuredly will lead to a final order of removal, and detention to execute the final removal order—which this Court has stated is permissible. Wong Wing, 163 U.S. at 235; see Zadvydas, 533 U.S. at 683, 698-699. Furthermore, when an alien has no credible basis for avoiding removal, his removal proceedings will be straightforward and, therefore, are likely to be particularly speedy. Withdrawing all objections to removal and departing the United States also is a reasonable alternative, from the alien’s perspective, to continuing with the removal proceeding and its associated detention. See S. Rep. No. 48, supra, at 19 (“A significant percentage of criminal alien deportations are of criminal aliens who do not contest their deportation and in many cases even wish to be deported.”). Such an alien “has the keys in his pocket.” Parra, 172 F.3d at 958. Similar considerations are present alien who entered the United States without inspection “is the same” as in a case involving a permanent resident alien. Radonicic, 28 Fed. Appx. at 116.

---

any time an alien asserts a defense to removal that, while not frivolous, is unlikely to succeed.

C. Mandatory Detention Also Is Especially Warranted
When The Alien Has Committed The Most Serious Crimes That Trigger Section 1226(c)

There are cases in which the nature of the alien's crime is alone sufficient to establish the permissibility of mandatory detention, without regard for the additional considerations of flight risk and immigration enforcement. That would be the case, for instance, when a terrorist is held pursuant to 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(1)(D). See Zadvydas, 533 U.S. at 696 (noting that "terrorism or other special circumstances" may support "special arguments * * * for forms of preventive detention and for heightened deference to the judgments of the political branches with respect to matters of national security."); Carlson, 342 U.S. at 541 (alleged participation in Communist activities sufficient for detention during removal proceedings). So too, a deportable murderer, rapist, or sexual abuser of a child who is placed in custody pursuant to 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(1)(B) and 1101(a)(43)(A) could make only the most tenuous claim of a due process right to an individualized bond hearing. Along the same lines, the Fourth Circuit suggested in Welch that a constitutional line might be drawn between aggravated felons and criminal aliens who commit misdemeanor offenses that are not aggravated felonies but nonetheless trigger mandatory detention under 8 U.S.C. 1226(c)(1)(B) and 1227(a)(2). See 293 F.3d at 225-226; cf. 8 U.S.C. 1229b(a)(3) (prohibiting discretionary cancellation of removal for aggravated felons but not other permanent resident aliens with criminal convictions); IIRIRA § 303(b) (reprinted in 8 U.S.C. 1226 note) (transition rules allowing release of criminals who are not aggravated felons until INS developed detention capability to implement Section 1226(c)).

Such questions need not be addressed in this case, because of the deference due to Congress's determination of what crimes are sufficiently serious to warrant mandatory detention in the immigration context. Nevertheless, the applicability of Section 1226(c) to aliens who have committed the most egregious and threatening crimes highlights that Section 1226(c) is not facially invalid.

D. Section 1226(c) Could Not Be Held Unconstitutional Without Reference To The Duration Of The Alien's Detention

Zadvydas illustrates that the duration of detention in aid of removal is another factor bearing upon its constitutionality, because prolonged detention imposes a greater burden upon the alien and (depending upon the circumstances) may at some point not serve the underlying governmental purpose. See 533 U.S. at 688-701; see also Salerno, 481 U.S. at 747 (limitations on duration of pretrial detention indicate its reasonableness in relation to legitimate regulatory goal); Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 269 (1984) (same). As already discussed, detention under Section 1226(c) generally lasts approximately one month or less, which distinguishes Zadvydas and strongly supports the statute's constitutionality. See pp. 39-40, supra.

In Welch, the Fourth Circuit relied upon the reasoning of Zadvydas to establish a rebuttable presumption that detention under Section 1226(c) for more than six months is unlawful. See 293 F.2d at 227, 228 (Widener, J., concurring), 234-235 (Williams, J., concurring in the judgment). That approach lacks a specific foundation in the text or history of Section 1226(c). Nevertheless, it does reinforce a critical point for purposes of respondent's facial challenge: The mandatory detention provisions of Section 1226(c) are constitutional in the ordinary case, and exceptional circumstances that present special due process concerns can be addressed on a case-by-case basis.

CONCLUSION

The judgment of the court of appeals should be reversed.

Respectfully submitted.

THEODORE B. OLSON
Solicitor General

ROBERT D. MCCALLUM, JR.
Assistant Attorney General

EDWIN S. KNEEDLER
Deputy Solicitor General

AUSTIN C. SCHLICK
*Assistant to the Solicitor
General*

DONALD E. KEENER
MARK C. WALTERS
HUGH G. MULLANE
MICHELLE GORDEN
Attorneys

AUGUST 2002

APPENDIX

CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

1. The Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution provides in pertinent part:

No person shall be * * * deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.

2. Section 1226 of Title 8 of the United States Code provides in pertinent part:

Apprehension and detention of aliens

(a) Arrest, Detention, and Release

On a warrant issued by the Attorney General, an alien may be arrested and detained pending a decision on whether the alien is to be removed from the United States.

* * * * *

(c) Detention of criminal aliens

(1) Custody

The Attorney General shall take into custody any alien who—

(A) is inadmissible by reason of having committed any offense covered in section 1182(a)(2) of this title,

(B) is deportable by reason of having committed any offense covered in section 1227(a)(2)(A)(ii), (A)(iii), (B), (C), or (D) of this title,

(C) is deportable under section 1227(a)(2)(A)(i) of this title on the basis of an offense for which the alien has been sentence [sic] to a term of imprisonment of at least 1 year, or

(D) is inadmissible under section 1182(a)(3)(B) of this title or deportable under section 1227(a)(4)(B) of this title, when the alien is released, without regard to whether the alien is released on parole, supervised release, or probation, and without regard to whether the alien may be arrested or imprisoned again for the same offense.

(2) Release

The Attorney General may release an alien described in paragraph (1) only if the Attorney General decides pursuant to section 3521 of title 18 that release of the alien from custody is necessary to provide protection to a witness, a potential witness, a person cooperating with an investigation into major criminal activity, or an immediate family member or close associate of a witness, potential witness, or person cooperating with such an investigation, and the alien satisfies the Attorney General that the alien will not pose a danger to the safety of other persons or of property and is likely to appear for any scheduled proceeding. A decision relating to such release shall take place in accordance with a procedure that considers the severity of the offense committed by the alien.

3a

* * * * *

Footnote omitted.